Chen Man, now 53, was released in February due to insufficient evidence by the High People's Court of Zhejiang Province after a series of appeals going as far as the Supreme People's Court.

Chen had served the longest jail term for a wrongful conviction known in China, and also has received the greatest amount of State compensation for wrongful conviction so far, Wang Wanqiong, Chen's attorney, told the Global Times.

The 2.75 million yuan compensation contains more than 1.85 million yuan for loss of personal freedom and 900,000 yuan for psychological trauma, the High People's Court of Hainan Province said on its official Weibo account.

Wang said that she and Chen accepted the amount though they were still unsatisfied. Chen initially demanded 9.66 million yuan in compensation after he was released.

"Chen and his family have no time to continue the struggle for compensation considering that Chen has lost two decades of his life and his parents are getting older," Wang said.

Chen was arrested in 1992 and sentenced to death with a two year reprieve, in effect a life sentence.

The local procuratorate deemed the sentence "too light" and called for Chen to be executed. The request was rejected by Hainan High People's Court in 1999, beginning Chen's 16-year appeal ordeal, the Xinhua News Agency reported.

Wang suggested that the State Compensation Law include more detailed clauses, so the future victims of wrongful conviction could get more reasonable compensation.

Chen is one in a string of high-profile exonerations.
