She expected a few responses, but received hundreds – not to mention a lot of media coverage – but it was Amalia McCallister who got the sweet summer gig.

Green, who writes for Refinery29, was looking for an animal person with good people skills – as Henry attracts plenty of attention in the park.

Her job involves bundling Henry into his pet stroller, taking him the few blocks from Green's home to Central Park, where he can roam free – and cleaning up after him.

She went for her second solo outing with Henry on Monday.

'The way you can tell where's a good spot for Henry is if there are weeds or dandelions,' she told the New York Times. 'Because there's no pesticides there, so he can eat the grass.'

She added: 'He also really loves to eat dandelions. It's like a field full of French fries for him.'

As Green had warned, Henry attracts plenty of admirers, adults and children alike, in the park.

After a couple of hours in the park, it was time for Henry to go back into the stroller and be wheeled home.

McCallister adds that so far, she loves her new job.
