Greeted by officers and soldiers, Xi, who also serves as the chairman of the Central Military Commission of the Chinese Army, started his visit to the army's joint battle command center.

Xi watched officers and soldiers dealing with various data and information, and listened to reports about the center and China's recently-restructured battle zones. He underlined the need for creation and reform within the army, to build a command system that is absolutely loyal, resourceful in fighting, efficient in commanding and capable of winning wars.

Xi urged the army to implement a set of military strategies and tactics that suit the new domestic and international situation. He emphasized that the center must focus on its core function of operational command, and bear in mind the ultimate target of building a stronger Chinese army.
