After giving birth, she holds her newborn to her breast with the rest of her young daughters watching on.

Simone said she uploaded the video to YouTube to show people what it would be like to give birth in nature and she never expected the amount of attention it has received.

The mother-of-four added: 'After 50 people watched it I thought OMG my friends have seen me really naked, after 500 I was shocked.

'To know that more than 52 million people have taken the time to watch me having my now four-year-old daughter Perouze and to get messages from mums and dads thanking me for sharing this intimate birthing experience because it helped them feel less stressed or scared about their birth choice decisions is great.'

According to Simone she always wanted to have a baby in the wild which she knows to many people sounds extraordinary.

Explaining her train of thought, she said: 'I am not a hippy drippy mum but I wanted my fourth child to be born away from beeping machines and a hospital environment.

'Let's face it women have been giving birth in the wild for thousands of years but the thought a modern women squatting in a creek and giving birth horrified many people even before I gave birth and shared the video.'

When Simone fell pregnant with her fourth child she discussed her dream of a birth in nature with her then partner Nick, who supported the idea.

The couple, who were living in Melbourne, Australia at the time, then went about finding the perfect location.

A friend of theirs offered them a house in the Daintree Rainforest area of Queensland and from there, they found a stream nearby.

????????????????????????????????????????????????????????????

Sadly the beach was not an option because of an infestation of jelly fish which is common along that area of Australian coastline.

????????????????????????????????????????????????????????????

The stream area was extremely dark, so in case of a night birth Simone and her partner installed a bathtub in the garden.

Simone went into labour at 11pm and was expecting it to be short.

However, she was still experiencing contractions at 9am and so she jumped in a car and headed to her 'dream' birthing location.

Two hours later squatting and naked in the stream Simone gave birth to her daughter who was named Perouze and is now four-and-a-half years old.
