奥运池水变绿终于有人给说法了！

The Olympics swimming pools turned green after hydrogen peroxide was dumped in the water, organisers revealed on Aug 12.

A contractor poured 80 litres of the chemical into both the diving and water polo pools on August 5, the day of the opening ceremony, but the mistake only emerged when the water started to change colour on Tuesday.

The hydrogen peroxide, more commonly known as bleach, neutralised the chlorine in the water, allowing algae to bloom and turning the water green.

There were farcical scenes at the Olympic synchronized diving final tonight after the pool turned amurky shade of green.

????????????????

The five-metre deep diving pool - which was a normal blue colour during the men's event last night - appeared to slowly turn greener as the competition went on.

Rio officials at the Maria Lenk Aquatics Center have so far been unable to provide an explanation.

Left, how the water appeared on Tuesday morning, and right, how it looked on Tuesday afternoon.

Need goggles? It was almost impossible to spot the divers as they swam back to the surface of the murky water after diving in.

????????????????????????????????

There's much speculation as to what's going on but so far, no definitive answer.

??

Several people have speculated that the change is due to algae in the water, perhaps because the pool is lacking in chlorine.

????????????????????????????????????

Other theories suggest because pool is outdoors, it can accelerate algae growth if the water is exposed to the sun.
