It was the weakest level since September 2010 as increased market expectations for an interest rate hike in the United States led to a stronger dollar.

In China's spot foreign exchange market, the yuan is allowed to rise or fall by 2 percent from the central parity rate each trading day.

The central parity rate of the yuan against the U.S. dollar is based on a weighted average of prices offered by market makers before the opening of the interbank market each business day.

The market is gradually revising the value of yuan which is believed to be overvalued from 2014 to 2015 and the expected U.S. interest rate hike has pushed the U.S. dollar index to new highs, said Ren Zeping, chief economist at Founder Securities. Ren also attributed the yuan's weakness to increasing downward pressures on domestic economy after the authorities announced a slew of property curb policies.

The scale of capital outflows was seen expanded in September, according to a report by UBS China. While the country's export growth was lower than expected in September, policy makers would not resort to depreciation to stimulate exports and economic growth in the short term, the report said.
