He added that Russia would respect the US more when he was president.

Mr Trump said frequently during his election campaign that he wanted to improve ties with Russia.

He has also repeatedly questioned US intelligence claims of Russian hacking in the election campaign.

After being briefed by intelligence chiefs on the report on Friday, the president-elect declined to mention Russia, but did say he had "tremendous respect for the work and service done" by those in the US intelligence community.

He also insisted the election outcome was not affected.

In the wake of the report, the US Department of Homeland Security announced that voting machines and other election databases would be classified as "critical infrastructure" and given more protection from cyber-attacks.

The report says that the Kremlin developed a "clear preference" for Mr Trump.

Russia's goals, the document added, were to "undermine public faith" in the US democratic process and "denigrate" his Democrat opponent Hillary Clinton, harming her electability and potential presidency.
