The notion that women like to be ‘objectified’ – meaning valued only for their physical attributes – is usually frowned upon.

But as long as a woman is sure that a man is committed to her, she is happy to be esteemed for her sexuality, according to researchers.

??

Yet if the woman has the slightest doubt about her man’s feelings for her, she is likely to find his lust a turn-off.

??

The psychologists came to their conclusions after asking newlywed husbands how much they valued their wives – from a sexual point of view.

The wives were asked how committed they believed their husbands were to the marriage.

Both sexes were asked how happy they were in their relationship. All gave their answers in secret.

The results showed that women who felt they had committed husbands were far more likely to appreciate being valued for their sexuality.

But that was not the case for wives who felt their husbands might consider other women.

Dr Andrea Meltzer, of Florida State University, said: 'Being sexually valued by a highly committed partner may positively influence women's relationship satisfaction.'
