India explains that if one partner brings home more money than the other but isn't treated with respect, they are considering taking their affections elsewhere.

Speaking to FEMAIL, she explained: 'One partner earning more wouldn't necessarily cheat, providing their partner showed them respect, gratitude and appreciation.

'However, if one partner earns a lot and the other becomes "entitled" or takes their lover for granted or stops being appreciative, the partner is unlikely to stick around.'

'Men know it's their role to protect, provide and support. It's the woman's role to receive gracefully, and also to show gratitude and appreciation for his efforts.

'For example, if what he provides is never good enough for her, he's unlikely to stick around. He'll take his efforts elsewhere, to someone who will make him feel valued.

'On a similar note, if she's always nagging, comparing and criticising him, he'll start looking elsewhere. This works the other way around, too.'

India compares her theory to a workplace scenario, explaining: 'If you came into work and complained about everything, no doubt they'd soon hand you your P45.
