China performed relatively strongly across the board, boasting low rates of early marriage and teenage pregnancy, said Wang Chao, Save the Children's country director.

Over the past decade, China has established a series of laws and regulations promoting the development of children, including implementing the Improving Child Nutrition Project in rural areas and strengthening the protection system for children left behind by parents who leave rural areas to find work in cities.

Given these tremendous improvements in children's well-being, it's not surprising that China ranked in the top quarter of all countries analyzed, Wang said.

However, Wang said China is the biggest developing country in the world and there is still a significant difference between the well-being of children living in urban and rural parts of the country.

There is still a long way to go in improving children's survival and development compared with most developed countries, he said.
