

A mother is an extraordinary thing. Take the woman whose toddler was caught on CCTV at Goodge Street Tube station being sucked onto the live tracks by a freak gust of wind. Without a moment's hesitation, she flings herself off the platform and hoiks the buggy to safety — just seconds before the arrival of an oncoming train.

It's a remarkable example of motherly instinct — that strange and indefinable sixth sense that kicks in when you have a child. A connection like no other. An invisible thread; light as gossamer yet as strong as steel.

????????????????????????????????????????????????????????????????????????????????????

And, as this woman's actions show, it can make you invincible.

Watch the video closely, and it seems almost spooky. She comes out of nowhere, like something out of a sci-fi comic, moving at ten times the speed of everyone else around her.

????????????????????????????????????????????????????????????????????

Propelled by pure instinct, she has no thought for her own safety — just to save her baby, no matter what the cost.
