Tokyo bid already being looked at

The Tokyo bid first came under scrutiny in January when the second part of a Wada commission report into corruption included a footnote detailing a conversation between another of Lamine Diack's sons, Khalil, and Turkish officials heading up the Istanbul bid team.

A transcript of the conversation cited in the report suggested a "sponsorship" payment of between $4m and $5m (2.8m pounds and 3.4m pounds) had been made by the Japanese bid team "either to the Diamond League or IAAF".

The footnote claims the Istanbul bid "lost Lamine Diack's support because they did not pay".

Wada's independent commission said it did not investigate the claims "for it was not within our remit".

A Tokyo 2020 spokeswoman described the note in Wada's report as "beyond our understanding", adding that "Tokyo's bid was about Japan's commitment to address issues around the integrity of sport".
