

《科技英语：代号斯巴达 微软发布新浏览器取代IE》

Microsoft rolled out its new Project Spartan web browser for the first time publicly today, offering members of the Windows Insider Program early access to the product designed to revitalize the company's position in the browser market.

Features of the new browser include support for annotating web pages. Users can either write or type notes on the page, which they can then share with other people. It's an interesting move by the company to essentially take its collaboration features from Office and bring them to the web.
