

《七年级上册英语完形填空专项训练14（含答案解析）》

We learn things from books, but what if we don't have them? An 8-year-old boy named Brandon once thought about that, and then he had a great idea.

One day in 1998, Brandon Keef was home from school with a cold. His mother, Robin, had to go to a meeting. So she brought Brandon with her. At the meeting, his mother and her workmates were talking about something and they were all excited. The children's center needed a lot of books, but they didn't have much money. Brandon listened and thought about this. He was sure he could find the way to help.

The next day Brandon was back at school. He told the class about the children's center and its need for books. His teacher asked the class to help the children's center. Then Brandon said that he wanted to hold a big book drive in the school.

Brandon's class held the book drive. They got hundreds of books in the school. Students and teachers then sorted the books, because they want every child to get the book—not too easy or too difficult. But Brandon did not tell his mother.

Then one day Robin came to school to pick up Brandon. When she sat in the car, she saw his boy waiting in the driveway with a big box: 847 books for the new library! "That was one of the best days of my life," said Robin.

Robin knew there were many places that needed children's books. She saw that Brandon's idea could help them, too, so she joined an organization called BookEnds. She hopes it will help more children to get a book to read.
