Teacher sick of students using cell phones in class suspended for secretly using cell jammer to block service

A Florida high school teacher was suspended without pay on Tuesday for five days for using a cell phone jammer to block students' cell phone service at school.

Dean Liptak, a former wrestler turned science teacher at Fivay High School, wanted to stop his students from using their cell phones during classes.

Liptak took matters into his own hands by secretly taking the disruptive device to school and activating it in his classroom from March 31 to April 2.

'I wanted to fix the cell phone problem in my class,' Liptak told a district investigator.

The Tampa Bay Times reports that Liptak said he never wanted to cause problems and that he thought jammers were permitted.

District officials were outraged and told Liptak he may have prevented students from making 911 calls in the case of an emergency.

'Not only did your actions potentially violate federal law, you posed a serious risk to critical safety communications as well as the possibility of preventing others from making 9-1-1 calls,' Superintendent Kurt Browning wrote in a letter to Liptak.

Liptak said he merely tried to get his students to focus on their school work.

'My intent for using the device was to keep students academically focused on schoolwork,' he said.

Parent Martie Cornell told Bay News 9 understands the frustrations with teens and their phones, but says safety needs to be put first.

"We've got to come to a happy medium, you know, protection and teacher sanity as well, but I think protection outweighs the teachers sanity," said Cornell.

Bay News 9 reports this isn't the first time Liptak has been in trouble for his alternative teaching methods.

In 2013 he got in trouble for writing violent science test questions.
