A resident surnamed Cui said that the road navigating atop the rooftop was designed for the convenience of those who reside in the hillside residential complex and need to drive up from street level or take a lift to get to their homes.

“Although we are used to Chongqing’s hilly geography, this is the main reason to build such a road,” Cui said.

The road wouldn't be a noisy disturbance for the residents, said another resident surnamed Liu, adding that there were no dwellings in the building below.

The upper three floors were used as parking lots and the ground-level was rented out for stores and restaurants, he said.
