On August 21, 1945, six days after the Japanese emperor announced an end to the war, his troops in China surrendered in Zhijiang City, central China. Japanese representatives signed the surrender memorandum, acknowledging defeat.

"This was the map showing the deployment of all the invading Japanese troops, some 1.1 million troops. Handing over the map meant a lot and was a very important process of surrender," Wu Jianhong, curator with Museum Of The Acceptance Of The Japanese Surrender, said.

Zhijiang City has special meaning to Chinese people. It was the site of the last battle between the Chinese army and invading Japanese troops.

There were massive casualties for both sides, but Japanese troops were halted there. Some believe that to be the symbolic reasoning behind China ' s choice to accept the surrender in Zhijiang.
